LANSING

THE State of Michigan is surely one of the most important States of the Great Northwest. With her enormous area of 58,915 square miles, Michigan is the largest State, with one exception, east of the Mississippi River. The adjacency of the Great Lakes so moderates her climate that the choicest fruits can be grown almost as far as the Northern Straits. Her vast resources in hard-wood timberlands, her enormous deposits of coal, iron, copper, limestone and other minerals, place her in the foremost rank of the States in great natural endowments.

This wealth of raw materials, together with the proximity of Michigan to the great Western markets, gives her unusual opportunities for the development of manufacturing, which while almost in its infancy has at the same time reached a very high degree in production.

The City of Lansing occupies a unique position in Michigan. It is situated nearly in the geographical center of the State, having railroad lines extending in all directions, laid out in comprehensive plan upon the banks of the Grand River, and being the Capital of the State is of much interest to the traveler, home-seeker and business man.

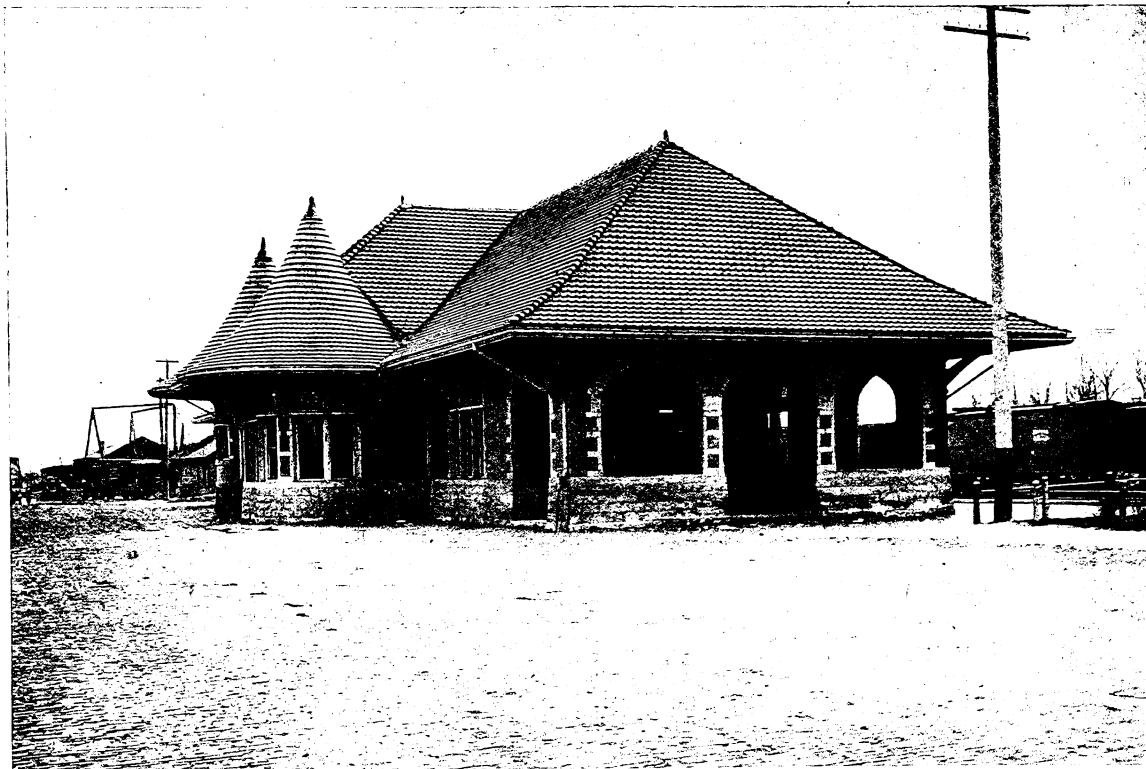

Lansing was incorporated in 1847, and in the same year the State Capital was moved there from Detroit.

The industrial development of Lansing has been largely due to the intelligent energy displayed by its Business Men's League, through whose agency several manufacturing plants of magnitude have been induced to locate here.

The City is beautifully laid out with fine wide streets and splendid avenues, substantially paved and bordered with shade trees for miles. Altogether it is a city of progress and one sure of great future prosperity.
